THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 17.

LUCK THAT NEVER FAILED. - A correspondent of the New York Herald has been interviewing an acquaintance of Hayes, who tells this anecdote of the President's luck :- "I consider him the luckiest man in America. He is Fortune's darling. I never saw an indication that he wanted position, but it has some how always seemed to come to him. He has always got just what he wanted and has been in exhalt-ed positions all his life. He is a man of destiny. He believes implicitly in his own good fortune, and well he may. There is a quaint vein of superstition in his character. I suppose we are all superstitious, more or less, if we'll only admit it. He told a certain general not long ago that he had often potioned that soldiers would never he had often noticed that soldiers would never fight so well the morning after they had seen the moon over their left shoulder if any body called their attention to it. In the big fight for the Governorship in 1867, when the result hung in balance for days, and men on both sides were wild with excitement, Hayes was perfectly calm, and when he was telegraphed that he had been elected Governor of the State by 2,900 votes he did not appear surprised. Several days afterwards, when he met a friend, he said to him that he had known for days that he was to be elected, because one night he was passing the Cincinna!i Gazette office and he happened to look up and saw the new moon over his right shoulder. 'I knew then I was elected,' said he, and he added, 'the only time I ever saw the moon really crooked over my left shoulder was the night before I was shot in battle.' I could give you some more stories to illustrate this super-stition, but—" "Go on; I wish you would."
"No; it might injure him among people who don't understand him. We mustn't allow the world to know all the weaknesses of a great "That supreme confidence in his own good fortune-does it always inspire him?" "Always. His good luck has never failed him and he has learned to believe in it implicitly. AGRICULTURAL.
